

MJW November Newsletter

Dear

There continues to be increasing concerns around the future plans of the new Justice team. Whilst MJW welcomes the focus on rehabilitation and mentoring, how this will be paid for remains unclear.

Payment by Results would appear to provide the answer. However, there is considerable scepticism around the ability of PbR to fulfil the funding gap so damagingly left by the cuts. MJW is in discussion with key people in government and other stakeholders to share the findings from its report "Just Results" which outlines important guiding principles that must underpin PbR, particularly when rolling it out for community sentences.

There are many lessons still to be learnt - but will there be time to learn them?

Crime and Courts Bill

Government proposals in the Crime & Courts Bill to include a punitive element in all community sentences – except in exceptional circumstances – have been debated by members of the House of Lords. The Bill is currently going through the report stage in the Lords and is likely to move to the Commons in the new year.

Make Justice Work are concerned that the mandatory inclusion of a punitive element risks undermining the discretion of sentencers to issue the most appropriate community sentences. As an unintended consequence of focussing on greater punishment there also is a risk of substituting rehabilitative elements for punitive ones, leading to an increase in rates of reoffending. Make Justice Work will continue to work with others in the criminal justice sector to

Chris Grayling's speech on the 'rehabilitation revolution'

On Tuesday 20 November the Secretary of State for Justice – Chris Grayling MP – delivered his first major speech on criminal justice since taking office.

Make Justice Work welcomes the importance placed by the Secretary of State on rehabilitation and the recognition that many offenders face a multitude of complex problems in their lives. However he missed a trick by not making a single reference to community sentences in a speech where the focus was on rehabilitation. There are more offenders serving their sentences in the community than in custody. While there are over 88,000 prison places in England and Wales, it is important to remember that last year the Courts issued nearly 173,000 community orders or suspended sentences.

The Secretary of State's enthusiasm for peer mentoring programmes for offenders leaving prison is welcome, but the real win is to catch the offender before they end up in prison by ensuring offenders on a community sentence have access to this also. This would help to stem the flow of offenders going from a community sentence into custody.

Police and Crime Commissioner Election

In the first ever elections, 41 new police and crime commissioners have been elected across England and Wales. They will be responsible for police priorities, police force budget and responding to local people's concerns. If you would like to see who the successful candidates were, you can visit the Home Office website.

MJW are looking forward to working with the new police and crime commissioners and help them with their role and have teamed up with the Center for Court Innovation to produce a briefing that will be sent out to the commissioners in December.
